in his book Dilbert and the Way of the Weasel. As he points out "Professional stock analysts can do something that you can't do on your own, and that is to talk directly to senior management of the company. That's how a stock analyst gets all the important inside scoop not available to the general public, including important CEO quotes like this: "The future looks good!" "

Definition. In the Dilbert strip of February 5, 1995, Dogbert says that "leadership is nature's way of removing morons from the productive flow". Adams himself explained, I wrote The Dilbert Principle around the concept that in many cases the least competent, least smart people are promoted, simply because they're the ones you don't want doing actual work.
