My parents still tell each other they love each other every single morning and night. They still act like two kids who have just begun dating. And, sure, they argue, but that's normal. You should only be worried when you don't argue. My mom says you should be comfortable enough to tell your significant other how you feel, even if it's not the same opinion. My dad still makes playful banter with my mom.

I was convinced I could never come out to my parents so I vented a lot of that grief and sorrow here. Fastforward a little, March 2017 I did come out to my parents in a letter. In April they finally wanted to meet with me and talk about things, it went better than expected because they didn't disown me and emphasized that they still love me.

I royally screwed up last week by trespassing and getting myself taken to the police station. My parents grounded me for 3 months. They said that they are doing it because they love me. How is grounding me for 3 months loving me? I feel like they hate me. I told my parents how I feel and they said that it is possible for them to discipline me and love me at the same time, but I disagree.

I was standing in my room in tears, and she was in the hallway and we were arguing about something that I can't even remember now, I think it had to do with my little sister. She was always favoring her over me. I said to her, "You don't even love me, or at least you don't act like you do." And I remember what she said back so clearly.
